MARYLAND

Historic Property Redevelopment Program

Preservation is revitalizing and investing in equitable outcomes—and using the best of our past to support that work.

Our Historic Property Redevelopment Program is making direct investments in Maryland's historic places through the restoration, rehabilitation, and revitalization of historic structures and the communities in which they reside.

Preservation Maryland pursues many approaches to accomplish this work, each tailored to the specific property, including: direct acquisition, rehabilitation, and/or loans and partnerships with for-profit entities on large scale redevelopment projects.

Every dollar donated continues to fuel future preservation projects, loans, and investments all around Maryland—in your community and across the state.

Featured Projects:

Preservation Maryland isn't just preserving the past—we're actively investing in our future. As a result of the generosity of individual, corporate, and foundation donors—and the support of local partners—the program is engaged in several high-profile rehabilitation and revitalization projects across the state.

417 N. Jonathan Street HAGERSTOWN, MD

Preservation Maryland's investment in 417 N. Jonathan Street, a historic log cabin threatened with imminent demolition, saved this humble and storied dwelling in the center of the Jonathan Street community in Hagerstown. Believed to be one of Jonathan Hager's original residences, 417 N. Jonathan Street is located in one of the state's oldest African American neighborhoods and nearby well-documented Green Book sites.

Burtis House ANNAPOLIS, MD

In partnership with the City of Annapolis, Preservation Maryland is leading a dynamic climate resiliency project on one of the last remaining 19th century waterman's cottages, a key component of the larger revitalization and resiliency plans for City Dock, the heart of historic Annapolis.

"I'm proud that we have all the right partners who are all dedicated to saving Burtis and turning it into a public asset."

— Senator Sarah Elfreth, 30th District representing Annapolis
